portioned mansions, either of stone, or else painted or stuccoed in imitation of stone. The old town is entirely different. Instead of broad and regular streets, you find them of every degree of narrowness, and in all possible lines except straight lines. But even here the architecture is to a certain extent noble—the high-peaked gables, fronting on the street, in many cases covered with curious carving-the multitudinous windows, with no less multitudinous panes of glass-the large donnays and the projecting cornices and eaves-are not less agreeable than striking; the whole-aspect of a street thus built being in a high degree picturesque. The streets are well paved with square stones, and kept remarkably clean-to an extent, indeed, that a New York Alderman could hardly be made to believe. Even the narrowest lanes are entirely free from filth-and the same may be said of the business streets, which are kept in constant use. In show and bustle of business. Bremen is more like an American than a European city. The Exchange is quite a large building, in which the principal merchants gather at one o'clock, daily, to transact business. I found the place crowded at the hour appointmerchants, all talking at once. A vast amount of merchandise changes hands here daily.

As Bremen is chiefly a commercial city, there are few sights for those who are looking for palaces and picture galleries. But the Don or Cathedral is remarkable in more respects than one. It is an immense building, with space within, it is said, for 6000 persons, all of whom can hear the preacher without difficulty. Its architecture resembles what is known as the early English style; and the whole impression of the interior is grand and noble. Under the church is a very curious vault, (called the Bleikeller,) which has preserved from putrefaction a number of corpses laid in it centuries ago. There was one that had lain here four hundred years: yet the body remains almost entire. The skin belike muscular fibre, instead of decomposing. Altoanimals.

Another of the shows of Bremen is the Rath-haus, (council-house,) an old and very fine building on the side of the market place. Within and without it is full of quaint and curious carvings and statues. Here again the grand object of curiosity is to be found in the cellars, where is kept what is said to be the oldest wine in the world, kept in a large cask called the rose. There are also twelve enormous hogsheads of old hock, called, irreverently enough, answer was prompt, "Judas." I tasted the rose

I may remark, by the way, as a national peculiarity, that the public grounds of this and other German towns abound in flowers, some of them rare and costly, and all unprotected by any fence or wall. This is generally the case, too, with fruits or flowers in front of private dwellings. The habit of respecting such things has become a second nature here; I have seen the youngest boys running and frolicking on their way home from school, with their satchels on their backs. among these tempting fruits and flowers, but none seemed to dream of plucking them. By the way, again, the school-boy's satchel here is a soldier's knapsack-a significant indication of the work for which the boys are destined. In Germany every man must work (or play) at the soldiers's trade for some years .- Corr. Christian Advocate.

Produce was scarce and in good demand. Sugar was selling at $3 75 to $4 25, and molasses at 14c. There had been an abundance of rain, and the young crops were represented as looking very promising. Remedy for the Cholera. The following letter, giving the experience of respectable shipmaster of the effects of a simple remedy in cases of cholera, has been furnished to the New York Evening Post for publication. The method is that resorted to by Dr. Dickson, of London, and the school of practitioners to which he belongs. He maintains that the cholera is produced by the spasm or palsy of the eighth pair of nerves—that is to say, the nerves which communicate between the brain, the stomach, and the lungs, and founds this doctrine on some remarkable experiments of the anatomist, Dupuytren, who showed that, by the simple compression of this pair of nerves, asphyxia is produced, which can be continued till it proves mortal, and girl had given him to play with. Powerful medicithat during this asphyxia the blood becomes of a black or coal color, and that it is attended with vio-lent efforts to vomit. The practice founded on this he was taken suddenly ill. Posthumous praise affects not those who have passed from among us, but it is the privilege of friends to chronicle their virtues, that "ethers may see their good works" and follow their example. To live so as to entitle ourselves to the grate-ful recollection of our acquaintances, ought to be a primary object of life, and a virtuous ambition is only satisfied with its attainment. Be assured that none appreciated this sentiment more highly, or endeavored to practice it more closely, than the de-ceased. Always kind-hearted and benevolent, she united in her character all those exemplary virtues and Christian charities that never fail to impress all with feelings of gratitude and admiration.

Although Mrs. GARRASON was the mother of no offspring, the sick, the needy, and the orphan, were all children of her affections and recipients of her bounty.
